Each one of us has a conscience, and often in the stillness of the night a man's conscience whispers to him to do the right as he sees right. I trust that no man is disobeying the whisperings of a stern rebuking conscience. I regard all men in our community as possessed of that kind of honesty that prevents a man from stealing; but we need more of that kind of honesty that makes a man honest with his own conscience.

As I sat down this morning to outline my short talk here today it occurred to, me that if I could direct my thoughts along the line of patriotism or civic pride I might be able to arouse some of the right kind of enthusiasm among those who have not yet been aroused to that degree of activity that shows results. If it were a question of loyalty to our country or its flag, every man in this community would say: "I yield to no one in my loyalty." But how about our civic pride? No man or set of men can say that he or they are better than the rest of us. We are all made of the same kind of clay, and I would like to see published in the paper the name of the man who is better than the rest of us. I have avoided being personal in the few short talks I have had here, but I ask you who is the leading citizen of this community or of any community?

Young had served a jail sentence on a similar charge in connection with a spurious order, alleged to have been given by a doctor, for morphene, in New Haven. Before hir arrest in that city his case was being investigated by Hartford detectives. Before the case there was ready the news of his arrest from New Haven, where a big drug evil campaign was in progress, reached Hartford.

Since then the investigation has been continued and the Hartford police allege they have established that Young was concerned in what was probably a state-wide distribution of drugs of a narcotic nature, such as heroin and other derivities of opium.
